

I entrusted you with my personal inventory stash, curious to uncover your true character. Rather than expressing gratitude for the products and the effortless profits they ushered into your business without requiring any upfront investment, I was greeted with a chorus of complaints spanning from product labeling to tardy deliveries, all while lacking a sense of professionalism. I'm well aware of the products I offer, and the reason for my leniency in our business dealings was my anticipation that you'd return. My intention was to put your character to the test.

Initially, we embarked on a journey from wholesale purchases to products from China, pricing dilemmas, attempts at product returns that ended in frustration, wrestling with inventory numbers, and even a complete reinterpretation of an email.

I'm perpetually on the lookout for individuals and partners who embody honesty, diligent work ethic, a collaborative mindset, and unwavering support. Regrettably, this experience stands in stark contrast to the values I hold dear. As a humble small business owner operating in a farmer's market, not a retail giant like Walmart, I expected appreciation for my offerings, yet encountered quite the opposite.

Your perspective appears to stem from a unique set of experiences that have shaped your outlook. I'm fortunate that such a perspective is foreign to me, even after a million years. The courtroom encounters you mention left me physically ill, inducing bouts of nausea each time I returned home. The ordeal consumed me for an entire week, leading me to lose faith in humanity. On a personal note, I often find myself misconstrued as flirtatious when all I intend is friendly interaction. I have no interest in intertwining business with pleasure.

Now, regarding the outstanding matter of delayed payment – is this contingent solely upon a future meeting?

Given this history, please help me understand why I should consider engaging in business with you again.